THE IMPORTANCE OF CULTURAL SAFETY NOT A PRIVILEGE

Following two years of extensive consultation by the Nursing and Midwifery Board of Australia (NMBA) the new codes of conduct for nurses and midwives have been released. These revised codes have an important new inclusion: the principle of cultural safety.

The Australian Nursing and Midwifery Federation (ANMF), Australian College of Nursing, Australian College of Midwives and the Congress of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Nurses and Midwives (CATSINaM) all participated in each stage of the development and consultation on the new codes. Responding to publicly aired misinformation these peak organisations for nurses and midwives have shown leadership by carefully and consistently explaining the benefits for all people when nurses and midwives provide culturally safe practice. In their joint statement with the NMBA the four organisations expressed unequivocal support for the codes' guidance on respectful care to improve health outcomes for Australia's First Peoples. NMBA's new codes of conduct feature cultural safety because 'racial discrimination is well documented as a contributing factor to poor health outcomes for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Australians' (Australian Human Rights Commission, 2008). The codes require that the care nurses and midwives provide eliminates racism and creates an environment in which Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people can feel safe to talk about their healthcare needs. In doing this, the codes are simply asking nurses and midwives to reflect, as they do in all areas of practice, about preconceived beliefs on which their practice is based, derived from 'what is normal for non-Indigenous Australians, particularly white Australians' (Muhammad 2018). This means reflecting on inherent privileges associated with being part of the dominant culture in Australia and acknowledging the impact of white culture on this country's First Peoples. In a previous column (ANMF, 2014) we talked about nurses and midwives discriminated against because of our skin colour, that we grow up with expectations of entitlements, often without thinking that others don't share that privilege. While we can't rewrite history or undo the wrongs of the past, we can commit to learning from the deep injustices of former generations and the perpetuation of discrimination by our generation (towards Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Australians).

As forefront health and aged care professionals, the importance of nurses and midwives having an understanding of Australia's history through the lens of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples, cannot be understated. The ANMF takes seriously our role in modelling and encouraging respect and reconciliation between Indigenous and non-Indigenous Australians (ANMF, 2016). Our business is to promote safe, competent nursing and midwifery care for all people in Australia - a culturally and linguistically diverse nation. The NMBA codes of conduct assist in the educative process needed to foster a culturally safe environment for all people receiving care, especially our First Peoples.

THE CODES REQUIRE THAT THE CARE NURSES AND MIDWIVES PROVIDE ELIMINATES RACISM AND CREATES AN ENVIRONMENT IN WHICH ABORIGINAL AND TORRES STRAIT ISLANDER PEOPLE CAN FEEL SAFE TO TALK ABOUT THEIR HEALTHCARE NEEDS.

On 26 January 2018, Australia Day, the ANMF posted a question to Facebook to elicit members' views on changing the date of Australia Day, in view of sensitivities the current date has for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples. Our colleague, Faye Clarke, a Gundjinaara, Worjabolok and Ngarrindjeri woman, and ANMF member, provided commentary for the post expressing her difficulty in celebrating Australia Day on 26 January, in the same way as other Australians. As she said, 'this date represents the beginning of very traumatic times for Aboriginal people, so why would we want to celebrate on that day? Commemorate yes, but not celebrate.' Responses from nurses and midwives to the ANMF post reflected those of the wider society, with both Australia is a white settler society like the United States, Canada and New Zealand. In such settler societies, colonisation and racism have had devastating effects on Indigenous health and wellbeing. These include the theft of land and economic resources; the deliberate marginalisation and erasure of cultural beliefs, practices and language; and the forced imposition of British models of health care systems of healing that had been in Australia for millennia.

As forefront health and aged care professionals, the importance of nurses and midwives having an understanding of Australia's history through the lens of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples, cannot be understated. The ANMF takes seriously our role in modelling and encouraging respect and reconciliation between Indigenous and non-Indigenous Australians (ANMF, 2016). Our business is to promote safe, competent nursing and midwifery care for all people in Australia - a culturally and linguistically diverse nation. The NMBA codes of conduct assist in the educative process needed to foster a culturally safe environment for all people receiving care, especially our First Peoples.

Displaying the Mizrahi Identity in Autobiographical Performances: Body, Food, and Documents

In this article Naphtaly Shem-Tov examines three Mizrahi autobiographical performances in Israel, exploring how they construct Mizrahi identity in different ways. The term 'Mizrahi' or 'Mizrahim' refers to Jews and their descendants originating in the Muslim and Arab countries. Although Mizrahim make up approximately half the Israeli population, their ethnic identity and culture are considered outside the dominant Israeli Western cultural orientation. The three autobiographical performances discussed here challenge these preconceptions and present an alternative, assertive identity for the Mizrahi community. The performers incorporate real elements – physical virtuosity, the preparation and serving of food, and the use of official documentation and personal records – to blur the lines between fiction and reality, and to draw attention to the different forms of oppression exerted on the Mizrahi identity. Naphtaly Shem-Tov is Senior Lecturer in the Department of Literature.
