Abstract
This essay will discuss the need for the humanities to address visual culture st as part of its interdisciplinary mission in today's university. Although mostly unnc in recent debates in the humanities over historical and theoretical frameworks relatively new field of visual culture has emerged as a corrective to a gr disciplinary territorialism on the part of art history. A study of the theoretical purv visual culture reveals that it in truth encompasses a continuation of art history's interdisciplinary humanist project of cultural critique initiated by Aby Warburg Erwin Panofsky. This article will argue that art history's inability to fully appre visual culture's relevance in today's research and pedagogical settings has give humanities the opportunity to address a field which is rooted in the humanities' p of interdisciplinary inquiry.
